my12 months ago Colt, as he called himself, representing himself to be a Second Lieutenant of Company B, Twenty-second N. G. S. N. Y., and a relative to the Hartford Colts, was spending a short time in Houston, Texas, where he met a handsome young lady whom he said he remembered having seen at New-port. He called on her, and, although she was already betrothed, became so assiduous in his attentions that she and her mother left for the North one Friday afternoon. He followed them on Saturday morning, overtaking them in New York. After calling on them at their hetel, he invited them to come to his house. Not particularly pleased with his appearance, though he had the dress and bearing of a goutleman and plenty of money, they excused them-selves. The young ladies of the family finally, however, consented to go to the theatre with him. Next day the ladies departed for Woodbury, Conn. At midnight that night he appeared at the same place, and engaged rooms near by. He declared that he had broken his engagement to New York belle, and made no secret of his infatuation for the southern beauty. She, however, barely tolerated his presence. Several times each week he made trips to New York to attend to his business, which he represented as being very pressing, holding at the same time that he had a fortune that would make him a worthy suitor for the hand of one whom he considered an heirese. He never tired of talking about his trips to Europe and his exploits at the fam ous watering places. Still the young lady treated him coldly. At last he proposed marriage to her, and on her prompt refusal of him threatened to kill her and himself. She only laughed at him, and treated him with scorn. He gave up that scheme, and going to his room fired a pistol. The landlord rushed in and found him lying on an apparently blood-bespattered floor with a wound in his arm. A doctor said the newest pattern for the production and bottling of carbonated drinks, which we are now manufac-turing of the very best quality, and which can be wound was a slight one, and later the red spots on the floor were found to be red ink.

The young man's mother was telegraphed for. On her arrival, when she was called Mrs. Colt, she corrected the people, and, said her name was Clark. This led to a brlief that he was an adventurer and the woman an accomplice. He was soon removed to New York. A few days later he asked for a clandestine meeting with the young woman, and was seen by a farmer to drive down the street in a covered carriage and much disguised. He didn't see her. Again he sent to a friend of the young woman word that this friend's husband was sick in New York, and, meeting her on the way to that city, told her that she must help him in his suit or he would kill her. She wouldn't help him. On Sunday he telegraphed to the southern lady that he should go to church in the morning and should kill himself at 3 o'clock. She didn't answer the telegram. The next that was heard of him the paper. The young woman from Texas, who is of a well-known and highly esteemed family, hopes this will also be the last that she will hear of him.
